A CHECKLIST OF THE CAVES OF TEXAS

A Note on the Distribution of Caves in Texas

Texas may be roughly divided into four speleologic provinces, herein designated as West, Central, Far West, and Northwest Texas. (see map) North, East, and South Texas are of no real speleological interest, although a few caves are known from each area. Small exposures of gypsum and limestone occur throughout these areas but are of insufficient size or thickness to produce many or large caves.

Texas has been naturally divided by the great Balcones Fault Zone, which extends north-south from the Dallas-Ft Worth area, runs through Austin and San Antonio, where it turns west and cuts through Medina, Uvalde, and Kinney Counties, eventually running into Mexico near Del Rio. East of the fault zone the upper Cretaceous sediments are non-cavernous and no caves of importance are found here. West of the fault, on the upthrown side, the lower Cretaceous limestones of the Comanche series are exposed. These extend in a virtually unbroken line throughout most of the Central and West Texas areas of the state and constitute the principal cavernous limestones of the state. The only other important cave-formers in Central Texas are sediments of Ordovician, Pennsylvanian, and Mississippian age, located in the area of the Llano Uplift. The cavernous areas of Northwest Texas are primarily in gypsum of the Permian age. Because of the remoteness and size of Far West Texas it is virtually impossible to present a reasonable summary of cavern development in the area. It encompasses the seven large counties of Brewster, Presidio, Jeff Davis, Reeves, Culberson, Hudspeth, and El Paso. Portions of Brewster County are considered in West Texas, while portions of Pecos are placed in Far West Texas. The reason being that the main Cretaceous sediments end at about the 103rd parallel, while the vast caving areas of Far West Texas are primarily in sediments of Permian and Devonian age, with only isolated Cretaceous sediments found. Although much of Far West Texas is unsuited for caves, large cavernous areas are to be found. These are at present virtually unknown to the speleologist.

Speleologically, the Central Texas area may be sub-divided into four major caving areas. The first of these is the Balcones Fault Zone, encompassing the counties of Bell, Williamson, Travis, Hays, and Bexar. The area is one of numerous small caves, Travis with 85 and Bexar with 64. The other counties will doubtless yield more caves once they are studied as intensively as Bexar and Travis. Most of the caves are relatively small, none exceeding 3000' in length. Most are either small pits or crawls, with only a few consisting of stream passages following the joints and faults associated with the Balcones Fault Zone. The Guadalupe River area is the second to be considered, encompassing northwestern Comal and Kendall Counties. A large part of the drainage in the area is by way of sinks and caves, which in turn lead into large stream passages which emerge as springs in creeks draining into the Guadalupe River. Among the most important of these springs are Spring Creek Cave, Honey Creek Cave, and the spring issuing from the Dead Man's Cave entrance of the Cave-Without-a-Name--Dead Man's Cave System. Besides these large stream passages, which attain miles in length, there is the huge Natural Bridge Cave with more than two miles of passage; and a potential of several hundred small and large caves. The third area is that of the Llano Uplift and its fringes. Here considerable fracturing and faulting coincident to the uplift has produced a situation similar to that along the fault, except on a potentially greater scale. It includes the counties of Llano, Mason, Gillespie, San Saba, McCulloch, Lampasas, Blanco, Burnet, Mills, and Comanche. Much of Mills and Comanche Counties are covered by upper Cretaceous sediments and most of Llano County is covered by igneous and Cambrian rocks, so that few caves will probably be found in them. Much of the area, however, is covered by the Ellenberger dolomite of Ordovician age and contains numerous caves, including Gorman Cave in San Saba County and Longhorn Caverns in Burnet County. San Saba, with 67 known caves and at least twice as many rumored, is potentially one of the state's leading cave-producers. Much of the area has been so shattered by the uplift that only small caves and fissures will be found throughout most of it. The most important caving area in Central Texas is that designated as West Central Texas. This includes Menard, Kimble, Real, Kerr, Bandera, Medina, and Uvalde Counties and contains caves distinguished by large rooms or long stream passages. Menard and Kimble Counties have been seldom visited but should contain many caves. The caves of Kerr and Bandera Counties, when more than small pits, are made up of large rooms, as in Station "C" Cave # 1. Much of the area, however, evidences the last stages of a karst cycle, with collapse and fill blocking many caves. Obviously large caves such as Goat Shelter and Priour's Pride are now filled almost entirely by the collapse of huge rooms. The only caves in the area of any extent, with a few exceptions, are those with relatively small holes opening into the center of large rooms as in Station "C" Cave # 1 and Seiker's Cave. Cavern development in Medina and Uvalde Counties, however, has been of a different order. Although large rooms exist as in Frio and Ney Caves, most of the large caves are long stream passages as in Indian Creek Cave and Valdina Farms Sinkhole. These constitute some of the largest and most interesting caves in Texas. Almost all of the water found in the area comes from caves such as these and a study of them will reveal considerable information of value to a study of the hydrology of the area.

The greatest caving area in the state is that of West Texas. It may be sub-divided into at least three major divisions, the first of which is an area of large sinks and few caves. It includes Irion and Schleicher Counties, and the northern part of Crockett County. The surface is that of a flat, undissected peneplain with all but a little of the drainage by sinks. Large sinks and sinkhole lakes as much as 500' or more in diameter and 50'-100' deep are found in abundance. The only caves of any consequence are O-9 Well in Crockett County and Cave "Y" in Schleicher County, both obviously in the early stages of cavern development. The second major subdivision is the large cavernous area of central West Texas. In southern Crockett, Sutton, Edwards, Kinney, and eastern Val Verde Counties full cavern development has been attained. It is an area of great diversity, with caves of such varying natures and origins as the maze-like Caverns of Sonora in Sutton County, large pits such as the Devil's Sinkhole and Abominable Sinkhole in Edwards and Val Verde Counties, large stream passages as Fern Cave and Kickapoo Cave in Val Verde and Edwards Counties, and deep caves like H.T. Miers Cave in Val Verde County. Although much work has been done in the area, the presence of many other large caves is rumored and the possibility of locating still more is considerable. A third area to be considered is that of western Val Verde County, Terrell, Ward, and eastern Brewster and Pecos Counties. Only one cave is known from Ward County and it is of no consequence. Most of the county is covered by non-cavernous Cenozoic deposits and so it is unlikely that many more caves will be found. The only part of the area that has been studied is near Langtry in western Val Verde County. Here 18 caves are known, 14 within five miles of the town of Langtry. These include the state's deepest cave, Langtry Lead Cave, and three other caves deeper than 250', so that it is an extremely promising area. Only two caves are known in Terrell County, but both are large and the potential is great. The same holds true for eastern Pecos and Brewster Counties where Cretaceous limestones are exposed which have not been explored for caves.

Far West Texas includes an area larger than the entire state of West Virginia; yet only 76 caves are known in the area and many of these have not been studied. It is highly complex geologically, and much of it is not suited for cavern development. The areas, however, that are likely to contain caves or are known to have caves may well prove to be among the best in the state. Most of the caves reported from Presidio

County are small solution pockets, seldom more than 30 or 40 feet long, in rhyolite of the Early Oligocene. Comanche limestones are exposed near Shafter and should contain caves. In Brewster County west of the 103rd parallel the principal cavernous limestones are of Permian age in the Glass Mountains and exposures of the Comanche series near Terlingua. Although numerous caves are rumored to exist in the Glass Mountains, the only one that has been explored to any extent is 400 Foot Cave. The area is rough and permission to enter is difficult to obtain. Most of Reeves County is covered by Quaternary deposits and most of Jeff Davis by igneous rocks, but along the Jeff Davis-Reeves County line there are exposed Cretaceous limestones of the Comanche series. It is from this limestone that the great cave spring at Balmorhea State Park issues. Both this cave and other caves near it are fairly large; the possibility of finding other caves near them exists. One of the greatest potential caving areas in Texas lies in Culberson County, covered mostly by Permian limestones and gypsum. Three ranges of mountains exist in the area, all of which are cavernous. These are the Guadalupe Mountains, the Delaware Mountains, and the Apache Mountains. Caves are known to exist in the Apache Mountains and are rumored from both the Guadalupe Mountains and Delaware Mountains. The thickness of the limestone deposits is great, and the potential for finding large caves is high. The area, however, is extremely rough with few roads and fewer people. The principal caving area in Culberson County, however, is the great Gypsum Plain, which extends from the Texas-New Mexico state line on the north almost to Van Horn on the south and from the Delaware Mountains on the west to the Rustler Hills on the east. No major streams cut across the area, drainage being almost exclusively by way of sinks and caves in the gypsum. The only caves explored by speleologists are Border Cave and Wiggleley Cave, both of which are fairly large. Many other caves have been reported by geologists, and the area will doubtless yield hundreds of caves. Although much of Hudspeth County is covered by sediments of Quaternary age as well as much igneous rock, there are extensive exposures of Permian limestone in the Sierra Diablo and a large exposure of Cretaceous limestone in the central part of the county. The four known caves in the county represent only a fraction of those which probably exist. Reports of large caves such as the Hudspeth County Shaft indicate the possibility that it may become a major cave county once it is studied. Most of El Paso County is covered by Quaternary deposits, but two mountain ranges are known to be cavernous. The most important is the Hueco Mountains from which at least one 300' deep cave is known and others rumored. The other mountain range is the Franklin Mountains near the far western border of the county. Only one cave has been reported from the area, but others are rumored. The mountains are composed of limestone of the Devonian and Silurian ages. In general, the far western portions of Texas mark one of the great speleological frontiers of the United States. The presence of caves exceeding 300' in depth and the rumored vast caverns of Hudspeth, Jeff Davis, and Brewster Counties indicate a potential of cavern discovery greater than any now known in the state.

The caving area most recently recognized is the extensive gypsum plain of northwest Texas. This area includes the counties of Nolan, Fisher, Stonewall, King, Hardeman, Cottle, and Childress. Caves in gypsum are also reported from Armstrong, Wheeler, and Randall Counties, where the Palo Duro Canyon has cut through Cenozoic sands and gravels and into the Permian gypsum beds. The area is virtually unexplored, with only 32 caves reported. Caves are also known from Lubbock County where a thin bed of limestone has been exposed in the walls of the canyon of the Double Mountain Fork of the Brazos River. Other caves will probably be found in this same canyon, both in Lubbock and in surrounding counties, but they will almost certainly be small. Most of the caves of Northwest Texas are highly unstable, and although some of them attain a reported length of 3000' to a mile, others are known to have collapsed within the last five years. When intensive investigation is made of the area, it will probably yield several hundred caves, at least some of which will be of considerable interest and importance.

Of only passing interest are the isolated counties throughout the state which contain caves. Denton County, in North Texas, has one cave reported from it. Nothing is known of it except that it houses the relapsing fever tick. Nacogdoches County in East Texas is known to have one small cave of no consequence; its neighboring county, Cherokee, contains at least two man-made caves in sandstone, of some historical interest. The southernmost county in Texas containing caves is Brooks County, where one cave is known to exist in gypsum and more are rumored. The outcrop, however, is small, and few caves are to be expected from the county or neighboring counties.

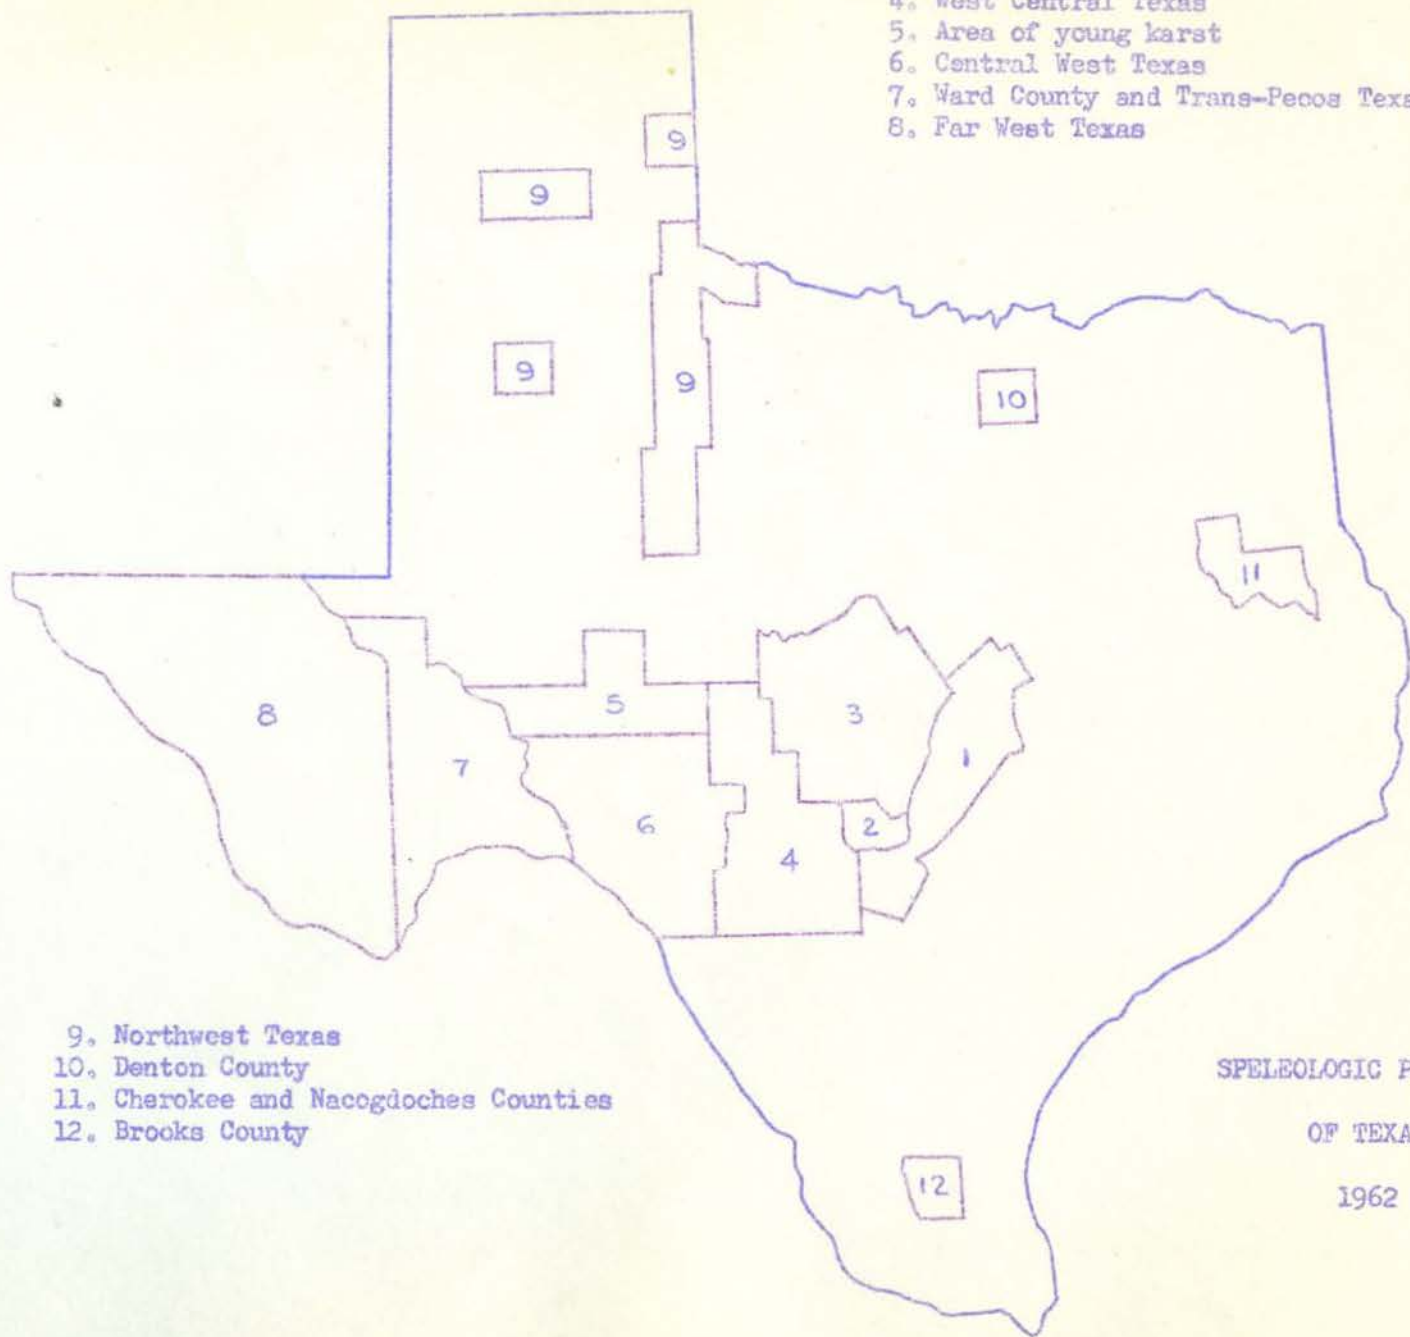

With more than 1000 caves cataloged in the state it may be assumed that the study of speleology in Texas is at least seriously underway. The rate at which caves are being discovered has increased tremendously; should this pace be maintained for any length of time, the known caves in the state will more than double within a few years. With an increased interest in caving in Far West Texas, the possibility of finding large caves is more likely; and although the possibility of finding caves of the magnitude of Carlsbad Caverns or La Gruta de Bustamante is all but out of the question, the presence of many more caves as large or larger than any now known in the state is not to be seriously doubted.

A Note on the Checklist

The primary purpose of preparing this checklist is to obtain additional information for the files of the Texas Speleological Survey. If anyone knows of caves not included on the list or can contribute to information in the files, they will be benefitting themselves and speleology in the state. The following symbols have been used in the checklist. If anyone is able to supply the name of an owner, the location or description of a cave, or any other information, it will be greatly appreciated.

- F — a filled cave
- 1 — a complete report on the cave exists in the Survey files
- 2 — the cave is represented by a description only, with no location known
- 3 — a location of the cave is available, but no description
- 4 — a poor location and/or description, but it is very inadequate
- 5 — the cave is known to exist but no valuable information is available
- * — a map of the cave is available in the files of the Survey
